Lokis (1970) is a poetic horror film written and directed by Janusz Majewski, and based on the 1869 Prosper Mérimée horror novel of the same name. The film's music by the award-winning Polish composer, Wojciech Kilar, was much admired by Francis Ford Coppola. Subsequently, Coppola and Kilar collaborated on creating an adaptation of the timeless Irish classic "Bram Stoker's Dracula".
This film sees a pastor, Professor Wittembach (Edmund Fetting), travelling to remote parts of 19th century Lithuania to study folklore. He is invited to the house of Count Michal Szemiot (Józef Duriasz), whose library contains many rare books of great interest. One of the books suggests that the Count might not be a completely human creature.
